Meeting me many years ago, you probably wouldn't see a Christian burdened with sharing the gospel. Though I could admit that Jesus called all His children to make disciples of all nations, the reality of the Great Commission was not seared in my heart—I felt unprepared, defenseless, and deathly scared, the introvert I was.

You see, I am a very shy guy, and one that is easily intimidated and keeps to himself. It's really out of my character to go out of my comfort zone and reach out to friends, family, and strangers sharing a message that could offend and sever relationships.

Early in my life, at the beginning of high school, I came to Jesus Loves Chinatown. Guided by the Lord, this ministry led by Pastor Andrew Rappaport effectively displayed the importance of sharing the gospel and prepared us with the right mindset. Through the messages, the Lord used them to convict me, and through many years of training increased the burden of sharing the life of Christ with the unbelievers. The ministry really dealt with me at a personal level, where I could ask any questions, and the leaders would equip
